Ways to support and extend student learning in this subject

- Encourage wider reading where possible. This doesn't need to be a fiction text: it could be audiobooks, podcasts, newspaper articles, graphic novels, magazines.
- There are a wide range of documentaries available on YouTube and the BBC about different authors, texts and time periods. Supporting your child through watching these documentaries can help them to develop a further understanding of the texts covered.
- Engage in discussions with family members about books and vocabulary. Students are often taught a range of more sophisticated vocabulary - ask them about any new words that they have learnt and try to get them to use these words in conversation.
- If there is a film or TV programme available for the texts that have been studied in school, watching these can support with the understanding of specific plot lines. Some of these will be available through streaming sites, such as Netflix, and through YouTube.
- The biggest challenge students face with Literature is the sheer amount of content needed to be learnt. Produce flash cards, summarising learning regularly in bullet points and general recap exercises will support students with their retention of this knowledge.
- The British Library enables access to a range of different critical insights into a variety of texts that your child has covered.
- Your child can access a range of podcasts through the University of Oxford and the BBC. These podcasts will offer a critical understanding of the texts covered throughout the year.
